Joseph Manning Highlights “Discovery Days”

By Maggie Hynes '25

From April 7–10, the Gabelli Presidential Scholars Program (GPSP) hosted the “Discovery Days.” Students accepted to the GPSP Class of 2026 traveled from around the world to Chestnut Hill to learn more about life on campus and all that the Program has to offer.

On the first night of the weekend, prospective students and a few of their hosts ventured to the McMullen Museum of Art on Boston College’s Brighton Campus to enjoy dinner, mingle with current students and faculty, and hear from guest speaker Joseph Manning (GPSP ’14). Manning currently works as a Judicial Law Clerk for the New Hampshire Supreme Court, with his focus on environmental issues pertaining to climate change and renewable energy.

“I’ve always enjoyed the opportunity to meet prospective students and demonstrate to them the value of the [G]

PSP community,” said Manning. “As an alum, my friends and professional relationships often continue to be entwined in the Presidential Scholars community. But I also strive to try and help current P-Scholars however I can.”

During his undergraduate years at Boston College, Manning was an active member of EcoPledge, an organization that works to implement sustainable practices on campus, as well as the Sierra Student Coalition, which is the student-led branch of the Sierra Club, a national grassroots organization that champions environmental causes.

After an introduction from GPSP Director, Kathleen Bailey, Manning took to the podium to address students and faculty. Through personal anecdotes—varying from staying up late in Mac Dining Hall with new friends when he was a prospective student, to gaining an unexpected friend as a result of a roommate debacle during his class’s trip to Nicaragua—Manning emphasized that the GPSP allows a person to build long-lasting relationships with people with differing backgrounds and views on life.

Manning pointed out that the thread tying his speech together was the sentiment of community, but he argued that the definition usually associated with this word—similarities among people due to a single defining feature or geographical closeness—isn’t an adequate way to describe the Program. Manning, in true environmentalist fashion, proposed an ecological definition. The GPSP, in his eyes, is like a collection of many unique species living and growing together.

“The [G]PSP community doesn’t end when you graduate. When I was a student, I relied on alums for guidance and advice,” noted Manning, before opening up the floor to questions from the prospective students.

“It was really nice to see all of the prospies together at the dinner at the McMullen Museum,” remarked Garret McCloskey ’25. “Joseph Manning gave a great speech and perfectly highlighted some of the best aspects of the Program.”

Once questions concluded, students and faculty stuck around, chatting with each other and with Manning about his GPSP experience and current work in environmental law. Prospective students slowly trickled out of the McMullen Museum, ready to begin the rest of their weekend. In every respect, Joseph provided a great introduction to all of the opportunities the Program has to offer, leaving a lasting impression on those who ultimately committed.

Boston College fencing celebrates after defeating No. 9 Notre Dame.

By Anisha Kundu '25

For the first time in program history, BC fencing is ranked, and the women's team was recently awarded the Team Academic Achievement Award.

On March 11th, it was announced that the men's fencing team broke the top 10 of the U.S. Fencing Coaches Association rankings and came out 8th. This news came shortly after a competitive performance at the ACC championships that occurred over February 26th and 27th where BC men's fencing placed 2nd.

I, Anisha Kundu '25, was lucky enough to travel and compete at the ACC fencing championships. The ACC is comprised of four extremely competitive, and all-ranked schools including, UNC-Chapel Hill, Notre Dame, and Duke. The first day was the individual round where I fenced each women's epee fencer from each of the four teams. The next day was the team event where I fenced UNC and some fencers on the Duke team.

BC fencing is hopeful as it sends two fencers to the upcoming NCAA Championships hosted at Notre Dame.

“Discovery Days” Continued: Prospie Adventures

By Steven Roche '25

Saturday morning, a large group of Prospective students and hosts met on Linden Lane for an adventurous day in Boston. Hailing from across the globe—from California to China to Peru—the newest accepted members of the Gabelli Presidential Scholars Program converged on Boston College to experience life as college students. With classes over for the week, they were taken into the city to explore various historical sites, tourist attractions, and restaurants. As everyone clambered onto the bus to go to brunch, the visiting students buzzed with anticipation and enthusiasm for the day ahead.

After a twenty-minute ride filled with banter, the group filed into Barcelona Wine Bar in the South End. The table was laden with delicious pancakes, home fries, bacon, and tortillas Españolas. Throughout the meal, some reminisced about childhood television shows and movies. Others discussed how their experience of Boston compared with their expectations of a city in the Northeast and throughout, each shared their passions and interests. After each having their fill, the group was ready to depart.

Walking off the bus, they found themselves outside Faneuil Hall Marketplace, where street performers flipped over spectators in the center of an open square. Splitting into four small groups, they began a scavenger hunt. They ran through the city hunting for the Boston Aquarium, Massachusetts State House, Quincy Market, Union Oyster House, and the prettiest tree. Although not originally on the list of things they had to find, a white and black dog was crucially added to the list midway through the hunt. At each destination, they took photos of themselves to prove that they had completed the scavenger hunt. Most groups began the scavenger hunt rapidly trying to outdo the other teams, but it did not take long for the groups to slow down. They took time to take in the beautiful sights and enjoy each other’s company. But as rain splashed down while groups headed to the final stop, everyone took off running again.

By 4:00 P.M., the group arrived at Lucky Strikes to bowl and enjoy chicken parmesan, salad, and pasta. Everyone wound down after the exhausting day, and the group continued to bond over strikes, spares, and gutter balls. By the time they left for the evening, the prospective students had a clearer idea of whether Boston College was the right fit for them. The sun was setting on their third day on campus, and they would leave the next afternoon. Current Scholars answered questions and shared their personal perspective on life at Boston College late into the night, and the prospective Scholars returned home the next day.
